

Riding the Wild Uighur

The Uighurs and China-suitably pissed off.

It all began around 1760 when the Dzungar Khanate, a confederation of several Tibetan Buddhist Oirat Mongol tribes and the last great nomadic empire in Asia rebelled in 1755 against Qing rule. China, suitably pissed off, then annexed Xinjiang eliminating the Dzungar in a genocide order by the emperor, perpetrated by Manchu generals and supported by Uighur allies. Some scholars estimate that about 80% of the Dzungar population, or around 500,000 to 800,000 people, were killed by a combination of warfare and disease during or after the Qing conquest in 1755–1757.

After wiping out the native population of Dzungaria, the Qing government then resettled Han, Hui, Uighur, and Xibe people using state paramilitary-economic corporations “tuntian”, along with Manchu Bannermen to repopulate the area. Settling military units and dumping unwanted detris from civil wars in frontier areas has been a long standing tradition in China going back to 200 AD. The crushing of the Buddhist Dzungars by the Qing led to promotion of Islam and the empowerment of the Muslim Begs in southern Xinjiang, and migration of Muslim Taranchis to northern Xinjiang. Talk about irony, the Han imported Uyghurs and Islam to Xinjiang. HaHaHa.

There were periodic conflicts over the next two centuries, but the region was largely left alone because it was so remote. In 1944, the Uighurs declared Xinjiang’s independence, renaming it East Turkestan—again, suitably pissing off the Chinese. When Mao Tse-tung’s Communists took power in 1949, they regained control of Xinjiang and began resettling large numbers of soldiers there. After the Sino-Soviet split in 1962, over 60,000 Uyghurs and Kazakhs defected from Xinjiang to the Kazakh Soviet Socialist Republic, suitably pissing off the Chinese. China responded by reinforcing the Xinjiang-Soviet border area specifically with Han Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps, XPCC or Bingtuan (“The Corps”) for short, which is a State Owned paramilitary corporation formed in 1954 from soldiers from the (Communist) First Field Army, former Kuomintang soldiers<sup>41</sup> and soldiers from the local Ili National Army, a soviet trained and led communist army. XPCC has 11 publicly traded subsidiaries....Communists holding stock offerings...weird huh?

Seriously, this is too easy. You want to sanction someone? Sanction someone where it hurts. In their stock. Like these publicly held stock corporations.

....Xinjiang Guannong Fruit and Antler Co.??? There's got to be a good story behind that... "So one day Guan was picking fruit, when unbeknownst to him a water buffalo was zeroing in on his behind. Moments later, a company was born."

So what's been pissing off the Uighers, recently?

Meet your new neighbors....." Han Chinese, spurred by government programs encouraging migration to the region, rocketed from 6.2 percent of the population in 1949 to 39 percent in 2010. The capital, Urumqi, is now a majority Han city." Han typically flood the zone, eventually outnumbering the locals.

No lollygagging... For Xinjiang's Uyghurs, 'Hashar' by Any Other Name Still Means Forced Labor (2017-02-16) "Hashar is the Uyghur term for compulsory labor in fields and roads..." forced labor has probably been going on since the CCP took Xinjiang in 1954. "They informed us that the hashar is abolished," a Uyghur farmer told RFA on condition of anonymity. "But they also told us that they will gather us for flood management and tree planting activities during the tree-planting festivals." Hey kid, ya' screwed up, you believed us, har-de-har-har.

Lonely Hearts...the Han 'one child' policy has led to male sex selection and way too many eligible Han bachelors. So, the Hashar for single, unmarried Uighur women was supervised work in coastal city's factories. "Among the most odious were threats from state officials of fines or even jail time if parents didn't send their young, unmarried daughters to work in factories in inner China." When male Uighur labor followed, there was bound to be trouble.

The Big Rumble...June 2009, two Uighur migrants on a state employment program were killed in a brawl at a toy factory in Shaoguan, 1,000 miles from home, in an industrial city in China's coastal Guangdong province....about alleged rapes of Han women by Uighur men. Isn't it always alleged rapes? A video made its way back to Xinjiang. July 5, 2009, students in Urumqi organize a protest. Did the police shoot? Were the Uighurs looking for revenge? We'll never know, but an estimated 200 people were killed — stabbed, beaten or burned alive in the melees that followed that night.

If You Kids Don't Be Quiet...

On 28 October 2013, a car crashed in Tiananmen Square, Beijing, China, in what police described as a terrorist suicide attack. Five people died in the incident; three inside the vehicle, two others nearby, an additional 38 people were injured.

Nobody expects Ninjas

In March 2014, a group of black-clad, knife-wielding attackers slashed its way through a busy train station in Kunming, the capital of Yunnan province, killing 29.

Xi gets suitably pissed

1 May 2014: When newly appointed Chinese President Xi Jinping visited three people were killed and 79 injured when attackers used knives and detonated explosives at Urumqi's south railway station, officials said.

They just hate shopping

22 May 2014: Attackers in two cars ploughed through shoppers while setting off explosives at a busy street market in China's volatile north-western region of Xinjiang on Thursday, killing 31 people and injuring more than 90.

That's a passel o'terrorists in one attack

July 28, 2014: After local officials discovered a cache of explosives, state media said, knife-wielding mobs went on a rampage, killing civilians and torching several vehicles and were subsequently gunned down by Chinese police. The violence "was preceded by a large-scale police crackdown in Hotan. State media now put the death toll at 96, including 37 civilians, and 59 people identified as terrorists.

We beg to differ: "We have evidence in hand that at least 2,000 Uyghurs in the neighborhood of Elishku township have been killed by Chinese security forces on the first day [of the incident] and they 'cleaned up' the dead bodies on the second and third day during a curfew that was imposed," she said.

The first campaign started in 2014, dispatching some 200,000 party members, including minority party members, to "Visit the People, Benefit the People, and Bring Together the Hearts of the People" (fang minqing, hui minsheng, ju minxin)—through long-term stays in Uighur villages.

In 2016, a second wave of 110,000 civil servants were sent into Uighur villages as part of a "United as One Family" (jie dui renqin) campaign, which focused on placing relatives in the homes of Uighurs whose family members had been imprisoned or killed by the police.

In 2017, the third wave of visits began as part of an extension of the 2016 campaign. This third phase of the campaign assigned more than 1 million civilians to Muslim relatives in villages for a series of weeklong homestays—often focusing on the extended family of those who had been detained in the drastically expanded "transformation through education" program.

“Firstly, Chinese hospitals have been performing a significant number of transplants since the year 2000, often on an on-demand basis; given the absence of a functioning voluntary transplant system, this implies that prisoners of one kind or another are being blood-tested and killed on demand. Secondly, China’s official explanations for organ sourcing have been both deceptive and inadequate in accounting for this activity, meaning that some other source appears to have been used. Thirdly, there is a significant body of evidence consistent with prisoners of conscience (first Falun Gong and now Uyghurs too) being used as organ sources.”

Let’s face it. Uyghurs aren’t cuddly. They don’t have Richard Gere drumming up support for them in cocktail soirees. They’d probably cook and eat the Dali Lama. The Chinese are even more odious. So, what’s in it for us?

Glad you asked. The PRC’s current treatment of the Uyghurs ...and Tibetans...and historically the Kazakhs and...well, just about everybody else who isn’t an ethnic Han has the entire Central Asian plateau nervous...and looking for somebody to love.

So what we need is a lightweight, low visibility force that operates on the edge of national and international networks; that has unique capabilities in the gray zone both at and below the level of armed force and across the spectrum of Great Power Competition; that can synthesize results from multiple dimensions of tactical engagement into a coherent program of on-the-ground, unconventional support within sub-national, indigenous constituencies for whole of nation political warfare. State and Treasury have their roles. Conventional U.S. forces have their roles as well. Roaming around in Central Asia isn’t one of them...maybe a little too aggressive...might as well poke Xi in the eye with a chopstick.

The PRC does well with the top down capture of rent seeking local national elites, through payoffs, bribery or kickbacks, and indenturing their states through signed infrastructure contracts with PRC construction SOEs financed by PRC banking SOEs. They don’t do well with the grass roots cross cultural people’s war...unless they’re Han. That’s a singular U.S. advantage. Time to monetize that advantage by utilizing financial intelligence, by utilizing micro-targeted economic, political and legal expeditionary warfare, and by capitalizing on the results of and reaction to PRC malign behavior.
